OTHER PERTINENT INFORMATION:

1. The proposed project will retrieve from the wreck site of the Winfield Scott artifacts which are normally covered by sand and have been exposed as a result of recent El Nino weather patterns. The Park Service which has conducted survey dives of the site in recent week has discovered the artifacts and is very concerned that unless the artifacts are removed they will disappear during the summer diving season. Staff concurs with the Park Services' assessment and believes that it is necessary to remove them immediately to protect and preserve them and to prevent their loss. The Winfield Scott wreck is a very popular recreational dive site and has in the past suffered from destructive anchoring and thefts by divers.
2. National Park Service archaeologist Don Morris has agreed to assemble and supervise a team to recover the artifacts in an appropriate manner. He will also seek a conservation facility and a repository such as the Santa Barbara Maritime Museum.
3. Constructed in 1851 in New York, the Winfield Scott a 235 foot sidewheel steamer was lost on December 2, 1853 when it grounded just offshore of middle Anacapa Island. Construction plans for the ship have not survived so the physical remains and recovered artifacts offer the only opportunity to study and important mid-nineteenth century coastal packet steamer. Such steamers played a significant role in the birth of California.
4. There have been two previous formal archaeological examinations and preliminary documentation of the Winfield Scott. A survey and documentation of the site is scheduled for latter this summer by a group from East Carolina University. Previous studies have been done under the supervision of the National Park Service.
5. The project area is within the Channel Islands National Park and the Channel Islands National Marine Sanctuary. Both agencies have granted their permission for the project. All activities under this permit will be carried out under the supervision of the Channel Islands National Park Service archaeologist. The results of the project will be compiled in a fieldwork findings report and copies will be furnished to NOAA and the Commission.
